Forestry and wood processing is the classic sustainable sector; trees harvested to create the everyday wood products that society needs can be replanted in a never-ending cycle. Unlike other sectors, an increase in the economic activity of the forestry sector also delivers additional environmental benefits including biodiversity habitats, recreational facilities, water management and flood prevention as well as cleaning the air we breathe. Modern productive forests are designed to fit the landscape and include a wide range of species and areas managed for biodiversity.

Productive forests soak up atmospheric carbon and the timber products from them store the carbon, helping Wales to mitigate against climate change and become more globally responsible.

Welsh timber is high quality, creating a wide range of products Welsh consumers want, the UK is the third largest importer of wood products in the world, we have a huge market for the products right next door. Wood processing companies in Wales say “we would double or treble capacity if the forest timber resource was there to do that”

We should take pride in the sector and support it with clear policies to ensure more home-grown timber is produced in the long-term to meet the increasing demand for timber products forecasted by The European Forest Sector Outlook Study II (2010)¹. WWF also this week issued the warning that “UK businesses face a timber supply crunch, amid expectations global demand for timber will treble by 2050 as economies and populations, and their need for wood and paper products, grow”².

Sadly, since 2001, the area of productive conifer woodland in Wales has decreased by 18,000 ha³ and as a result by 2029 there will be a major fall-off in the long-term supply of timber which could be devastating for wood using businesses and jobs they sustain in Wales⁴.

The supply crisis has been exacerbated by the failure to meet WG planting targets (because of increased bureaucracy and delays in obtaining permissions to plant trees) and by the lack of restocking with commercial species by NRW on the Welsh government owned woodland estate. NRW has an area of around 5000ha of unstocked land, is continuing to fell 2000ha/year and restocking only 1300ha/year exasperating the problem.

Pam mae'r cyfraniad yn bwysig

With global demand rising, pressure on timber from overseas is rising. Wales must reduce its demand on imports and ensure a sustainable long-term domestic supply of timber.

4 NFI Statistical Analysis Report 50-year forecast of softwood timber availability

The WWF report⁵ makes a call, to “boost commercial forestry without damaging the other values of woodlands such as wildlife and recreation, the report recommends bringing unused or underused forest back into management and planning forestry at a landscape scale”. It also urges planting trees which have a commercial and wildlife value.

The forestry and wood-using sector in Wales has an annual Gross Value Added (GVA) of £500 million and employs between 8,500 and 11,300 people in Wales⁶. This could be significantly increased by a programme of productive woodland creation in Wales.⁷

The forestry sector can deliver for the Welsh economy, its environment and society – and deserves to be afforded a much greater priority in policy-making.

Wales has an ideal climate for growing trees and there has never been a stronger case for dramatically increasing the forest area of Wales. Even the public purse will benefit from a change in land use towards forestry, as once established, forestry can deliver a strong economic output and will rely far less on public subsidy.

Dull newydd o reoli tir yn gynaliadwy yng Nghymru

The UK's decision to leave the EU presents us with a unique opportunity to develop new policies that will help Welsh Government meet its aspiration for Wales to be a world leading sustainable country, as set out in the Well-being of Future Generations Act and the Environment Act. Key to this will be reform of existing land use policies, most importantly the Common Agricultural Policy, which despite supporting farmers for decades has failed to build resilient agriculture and prevent damage to the environment.

A new policy framework, aligned with Wales' commitment to sustainable development would secure benefits for people, the environment and nature as well as a sustainable economic future for farmers, other land managers and wider rural communities. This new framework would:

Support sustainable land management that maintains and enhances nature and the resilience of ecosystems to provide wide ranging social, economic and environmental benefits for Wales.

Secure sustainable amounts of safe, healthy food and timber and provide a diverse range of sustainable products that generate income and employment for rural businesses and contributes to a diverse rural economy.

Ensure that all public money invested in land management delivers true value by securing benefits for wider society.

Engage with wider society to help people make choices that recognise and reward sustainability as the norm in the way they live.

A realistic transition period towards these new arrangements will be vital and particularly important for the most economically vulnerable, such as those in our extensive livestock sector (typically associated with the uplands) who are often farming in marginal areas but which are of high environmental, landscape, recreational and nature value.

Pam mae'r cyfraniad yn bwysig

This new framework will support progressive, innovative farmers and land managers, providing them with the certainty to engage in sustainable production. It will ensure public money is focused on supporting resilient rural businesses capable of meeting diverse environmental challenges such as the restoration of habitats, storage of atmospheric carbon and the natural management of flood risk and drinking water and in doing so ensure the best use of the land in Wales for everyone.

A similar ambition for sustainable management of our seas is also important.

Prisiau llefrith decach i ffermwyr

Current milk prices means that farmers currently produce milk at a loss unless they can farm on a very large scale. Farmers would prefer a fair price for milk over any subsidies as allows them to be in control. Supermarkets don't pay a fair price. Setting minimum prices would allow farmers to rely on their produce to make an income rather than subsidies.

Farmers are going out of business on a daily basis as importing milk produce from the EU and non-countries flood the market. We should support our farmers.

These small farms are the backbone of rural communities and also essential in maintaining the Welsh language, culture and traditions that are sadly being eroded due to low wage levels and lack of farm profits to distribute. The benefits to having a thriving and good quality local log supply can make a significant difference to the rural sector. Local supply of firewood is an unsung hero of the rural economy, and it contributes to supporting good quality woodland management - which is itself important for flood management, biodiversity support and access for countryside users.
